Social transformation is the driving impulse of women’s studies and feminism in the academy and in the wider world. Yet, how do we inspire social transformation when day after day, year after year, it seems like conditions in the world are getting worse. We study and research and accumulate evidence to show that transformation is real. Our pedagogies need to be convicted that transformation is possible as we do the deep inner work that secures our conviction that there is a promised land within our capacity to realize and the authentic possibility of another world.

Dr. Liz Philipose is an educator whose research focuses on consciousness, the human condition in modernity, and potential catalysts for social transformation. Her interests have taken her into academic work and a tenured professorship in the fields of feminist philosophy, international politics, and cultural studies.
