Abolition in “Real Time”: Praxis and Relationality

Thursday, April 19, 7-9pm, West Commons 220

This event recognizes Women’s Studies scholarship awardees for their academic and activist accomplishments.

Tiffany Lethabo King’s research focuses on Black gender formation and sexuality at the intersection of slavery and indigenous genocide in the U.S. and Canada. Her book project The Black Shoals: Off Shore Formations of Black and Indigenous Studies is under contract with Duke University Press. In it, she argues that scholarly traditions within Black Studies that examine Indigenous genocide alongside slavery in the Americas have forged ethical and generative engagements with Native studies—and Native thought—that continue to reinvent the political imaginaries of abolition and decolonization.

This event is co-sponsored by: Africana Studies and the Instructionally Related Activities fund of the College of Arts and Letters
